This idea, perhaps, has arisen because carnivorous animals are more ferocious than herbivorous, but this probably is not due so much to the effect of what they eat as it is to the method of obtaining it. The ferocious animal can attack and destroy the animals on which it feeds, while the life of the herbivorous animal is peaceful and non-combative. I doubt very much whether a meat diet tends to excite the so-called fighting properties of the human animal.

Inasmuch as the human animal gets all of his food in the same way the effort to secure it is peaceful. Very little human food is now obtained directly by the hunter himself for his own purpose.

Hunting is no longer a food getting profession, but merely a recreation, and the same may be said of fishing. The vast majority of people who eat meat and fish, buy these articles as they do their wheat and potatoes.

The feeding of athletes for supreme moments of exertion almost exclusively with meat is probably a dietary error, as they would be capable of still greater exertions on a diet composed more largely of potatoes.

From the general principles of nutrition which have been announced, namely, the undesirability of excessive feeding and the desirability of so adjusting the diet as to keep the body weight in equilibrium, it is doubtful if any particular kind of food has any particular relation to any profession.

Good, wholesome food in proper quantities of the same kind, may be fed to the soldier, the sailor, the farmer, merchant, literary man, physician, minister, diplomat, the street cleaner and the car driver with equal propriety. There is little scientific basis for the common opinion that certain kinds of food influence control particular traits of character.

George A. Papausky, the banker-magician, convicted of using the mails for improper purposes, and who posed as the reincarnation of Moses, was sentenced to six months in the Bridewell by Judge Landis today.

Latest invention with University of Chicago co-eds is the "canned" kiss, like a finger print, only made with rouged lips on a white card. Although a reward has been offered, the inventor can not be found.

The city has won the fight for outer harbor. That's enough.
